An introduction to our wine list

Let's make no bones about it: we are proud of our wine list. It has taken us over 20 years of constant attention to get it where it is today. So what is all the fuss about? every restaurant has a wine list...

You don't want a list that's composed of just one merchant's selection of wines. Using one can make life easy for the restaurant owner but no merchant has all the best wines. We have sourced wines from all the top wine merchants and imported many of our wines from the vineyards themselves. Our list of suppliers sounds like a roll call of the great and good, including: Berkmann, Hellamshire Wine Shipping, Les Caves de Pyrene, Boncoeur, Castillon, Cockburn and Campbell, Corney and Barrow, Domaine Direct, Enotria Wines, Field and Fawcett, Firth and Co., Hallgarten Wines, Jurgen Kaiser, John Kelly of Clifford, O.W.Loeb, LMVH, Maisons Marques and Domaines, McKinley Vintners, Moet Chandon, Pagenham and Pratt, Steep Hill Wines, Tanners of Shrewsbury, Thorman Hunt and Pol Roger.

Creating a wine list is like building a football team: buying the best wines when they are ready for drinking is a very expensive option, but with a good youth team policy buying the wines as they are first released, when they are at their least expensive, makes better economic sense. Eventually, you have wines from good vintages that are ready to drink and cost the customer what an unready wine from a mediocre vintage costs in most restaurants. A lot of the best wines are offered young and then disappear into the cellars of the wealthy, never appearing on wine merchants' lists, never mind restaurants. You need a good scouting team who look at the widest range of wines possible from all over the world. This means using good merchants' advice; attending as many tastings, often in London, as possible; and keeping abreast of wine gossip on various web sites and magazines; and reading the opinions of gurus like Robert Parker Jr., Allan Meadows and Jancis Robinson, and not slavishly following their numbers, but recognising their prejudices and enthusiasms.

We have done all this hard, difficult and time consuming work, ruining our livers, dicing with wine slurpers' elbow and casting a snook at gout and apoplexy, with a true dedication to our calling.

Happy Drinking!

Did you know...

Champagne has often been a female business. Various widows ran the big houses during eras when it was unusual to see a woman in charge. She may not have been the first (widow Soyez came before her), but Mrs. Clicquot remains the archetype. Her wine was even called La Veuve ("The Widow")

Loire Valley

The Loire has a lot more to offer than Sancerre, choose one of the red Cabernet Francs from Chinon or Bourgueil and experience the finesse and elegance that the Cabernet Sauvignon has lost through the popularity of New World styles. A word to the wise: Sancerre and goats' cheese are made for each other.

Did you know...

During the late 19th century, several villages in the Cote d'Or were awarded the right to add to their name(s) of the grands crus produced in their locality. Thus, in 1882, Chambolle took the name Chambolle-Musigny, Gevrey became Gevrey-Chambertin, both Puligny and Chassagne villages share the name of their grand cru, the famous Montrachet and Ladoix, while Vosne has naturally benefitted from the reputation of Romanee.

FRANCE

Rhone

White Rhone, with the possible exception of Condrieu, is very unfashionable, partly as a result of grape varieties few have heard of, partly the often overblown style and partly its cost. All this is a shame because the well made wines are lost to most white wine drinkers. Our white Chateauneuf will surprise and delight the palates of those open minded enough to try it. There is proper Chateauneuf du Pape from serious growers that is getting more expensive by the second and cheap, dilute, over- sugared wines tasting of dirty old wood.

SPAIN

Does any country give such value and diversity in red wines as Spain? We collect the ultra traditional in fine vintages from La Rioja Alta and Vega Sicilia and the up and coming from areas like Priorat and Castilla Leon. Most of these are not supermarket cheap because of the costs of production but they more than stand up to more expensive wines from more well known sources. They are also food wines which, strangely enough, are meant to be drunk with food, which is not the same as saying that they are too tannic to drink on their own. Modern Spanish whites made from the Viura grape can be dull or bland but for real character try the old fashioned VinaGravonia, with its savoury flavours of wood or the mouth-watering minerality of the Albarino.

Did you know...

Vineyard yields in Spain are among the lowest in the world.

The average yield is just 1.4 tons per acre (25hl/ha). This figure is remarkably low, especially when compared with that of neighbouring countries (4.2 tons per acre/70hl/ha on average in France). It can be attributed to the presence of very old vines in the various growing areas, as well as the rigorous climatic conditions that make life quite tough for the vine - but to the benefit of the wine.

Poor old Jancis Robinson has been trying for over thirty years now to get us to drink German Riesling or the unacceptability of genuinely medium sweet wine. We applaud her efforts but economics forces us to offer a very limited selection but from the very best producers.

NEW ZEALAND

Now reeling a little from over-production the Sauvignon Blanc success story in New Zealand from a standing start in the early eighties to world domination in the last decade or so, is quite extraordinary. And they look as though they might do a similar job with Pinot Noir and even follow that with Syrah, sorry Shiraz. As to the question do New Zealand wines age well, the 1993 Cabernet from the Goldwater Estate in the North Island can answer very much in the affirmative.

Did you know...

More than 90 percent of New Zealand wines are sealed with a screwcap. Beginning in 2001, work with this closure has convinced producers that it is the best solution for wines renowned for their freshness and aromatic purity. They have even formed an association called “New Zealand Screwcap Wine Seal Initiative,” designed to promote and explain the virtues of the screwcap.

AUSTRALIA

Once everyone's favourite source of exciting new wines, Australia is suffering from consumer indifference especially at the prestigious end where they have been patiently and successfully working away for the last twenty years. The wines have not got worse, most have improved but customer loyalty was lost somewhere along the way. Retasting wines like the Dead Arm Shiraz from the 2001 vintage makes their relative neglect ridiculous. We doubt that there is better value for money in the whole of our list.

USA

We remember the 1978 tasting battle of the premier wines of California and Bordeaux. It was inconceivable that the Americans might win then and now it's even more inconceivable that the grandees of Bordeaux would ever allow another such contest. Our wines come from small boutique wineries, where quality is all important.

CHILE

Chile seems to have replaced Australia for the supply of simple well made prices at a modest price. But they are not content just to make basic wines, try the Ninquen red. It would flatter a much more famous wine region to have produced it. The favourable conditions for winemaking have tempted the Rothschild family of Bordeaux to become involved in the business with Los Vascos, making a fine Cabernet Sauvignon. What else?
